is not present in Colorado. The general assembly required the reintroduction of black-footed ferrets to occur only pursuant to a management plan dating to 1995. Pursuant to that authority, some black-footed ferrets were reintroduced in Colorado in 2001.

Since then, the federal fish and wildlife service has authorized a new tool for endangered species reintroductions based on a programmatic "safe harbor" agreement between the federal government and a consenting landowner and enhancement-of-survival permits under the federal "Endangered Species Act of 1973". Under the permits and agreements:

- ! The reintroduction occurs on private land with landowner consent;
- ! An "incidental take" (that is, an unintentional injury or death) of the threatened or endangered species may result from implementation of conservation actions, specific land uses, and the landowner's exercise of an option to return the land to baseline conditions, and the landowner would not be liable for the taking; and
- ! Landowners have assurances that the federal government will not impose further land, water, or resource-use restrictions or additional commitments of land, water, or finances beyond that agreed to in the agreement.

The bill authorizes the reintroduction of black-footed ferrets in Colorado pursuant to programmatic safe harbor agreements and enhancement-of-survival permits without further legislative approval.
